November 4, 2016

You don't need special Egyptian tools to create a mummy in Wyoming. All you need is warm, dry conditions, some wind, and salty popcorn. Here's a tip: never eat salty popcorn when it's dry, warm & windy & especially around Halloween. You'll feel like a mummy driving around town, and it doesn't help that you have the windows down in the car because it's almost 70 degrees outside and you're dressed for November weather. Any hope of moisture in your skin gets sucked into the salt and blown away by the wind.

And speaking of Halloween, I just want to remind you of two things: First, it's November, in case you were wondering. Halloween was last week. This week Daylight Savings starts. Or ends. I never remember which. But we get an extra hour to sleep in on Sunday. All of this means it's supposed to be winter. So in case you're wandering around in your winter outfits, because it's November, and are wearing flannel pjs at night, because it's November, and are dying of the heat, don't blame me for your confusion. I'm telling you that the leaves have all left the trees and the prairie grass is crisp and brown. Therefore, it's winter. Just don't turn on the air conditioner.

This time of year I like watching themed movies based on the closest holiday. So for Halloween, I watched the Halloween franchise movies. You really have to suspend your disbelief when watching these movies. Spoiler alert: The Boogymen (Mike Myers) never dies. Neither does Laurie, his sister. But you don't learn she's his sister until movie 2. And the doctor/psychiatrist never dies, either, despite being blown up, with Mike, at the end of movie 2. And although Mike's dead, again, after movie 8, the camera zeroes in on his hand, which is still twitching. Can we all say Halloween 9? Maybe Laurie won't be dead, won't be his sister after all, and they'll get married. Maybe they'll hire me for the rewrite.

Anyway, I had a hard time keeping track of the Halloween plots-quit laughing. There is a plot: Mike escapes, kills a bunch of people, gets blown up, comes back to life. But extra story lines get woven in and because I did not watch them in order, I couldn't figure out why a character that I thought was dead really wasn't. And then I realized it had nothing to do with the order of movies. It had everything to do with that particular movie's story line. If the character that had previously died was needed in the next movie, there would be a toss off line in the next movie, "Oh, well, she really didn't die," and everyone would shrug their shoulders and the movie would go on. And vice versa. If a character from a previous movie wasn't needed, at the beginning of the movie, someone would say, "Isn't it too bad so & so died?" and the movie would just move forward. Kinda like Dallas, when they killed off Bobby, filmed 31 episodes without him ('cause he was dead) then brought him back to life. He showed up in the shower talking to his wife, who was complaining about this awful dream she had where he was dead for a year. And the show wound up running for at least 3 more years, not counting its revival in 2012. I watch a lot of sci fi and it's easier to accept flying dragons and talking plants than it is this stuff.

And for those of you who get scared watching these movies, try watching them during the day. You can't see half of what goes on. And because the movies are imagery driven, there isn't much dialog. My dad had a theory that cheap movies and tv shows were always filmed at night. If you can't see what's going on, you won't know if any mistakes are being made. Horror/slasher movies always take place after dark.

Now my favorite Halloween movies are either the Alfred Hitchcock varieties or the classic Dracula, Mummy, Frankenstein ones. I have to be careful watching the original 1956 Werewolf movie-they used real werewolf voices and it drives Cassidy nuts. Cassidy is an Australian Shepherd. She doesn't watch tv. But she pays attention when real dogs or wolves, were or otherwise, are howling through the speakers. She has a tendency to talk back.

Becca knows better. She doesn't watch any of this and she questions my intelligence wondering why I bother watching such stuff. She even knows the barking dogs are stunt doubles--not the real thing.

And the last scary thing I want to talk about is this year's World Series. Did you watch? This falls into the scary good category. After every inning, I knew the other side was going to win. And the end of each game, I knew that whoever had won that game would win the series. What a marvelous way to end the fall. Now if the weather would just cooperate.
